OAP* with debts of £180,000 on 33 credit cards

By Khushwant Sachdave

Short of money and desperate for a foot operation, old-age pensioner Gerard Rock decided to get private medical care. This decision put him into debt and left him owing nearly £180,000 on 33 credit cards. The case will renew calls for card companies to collaborate to control how many cards a person can have and how much money they owe. Surprisingly, Mr Rock has more than one card with some companies.

“I can’t sleep because all I can think about is how I am going to get out of this trouble,” he said yesterday. “I’ve thought about suicide, but I can’t do it because I’m really a coward.”

Retired teacher Mr Rock’s problems started in 1987, when he stopped working because of poor health and paid for private medical foot treatment. Since then he has had more than 50 operations, including more treatment on his feet and surgery on his back, wrists, eyes and ears. He faced long waiting lists and was told he was not a priority. Mr Rock, who lives in Kent, decided to pay privately each time. So he signed up to a number of private healthcare schemes to get full insurance cover for his operations.

The monthly premiums for these came to £380 – nearly half of the £800 he received every month in pension benefits. He paid cash for his living costs and tried to pay his debts by getting more cards for his monthly minimum payments. But they now are as high as £4,000 and the pensioner – who owes a total of £176,210.30 on cards – says he can no longer pay anyone. He owes more than £12,000 each on two cards and more than £10,000 on a card from Beneficial Finance.

Mr Rock, a single man, blamed the card companies. “They have made it so easy for me to get into debt by increasing my credit limits on the cards,” he said. He had asked why they increased his limit and was told that a computer decided. “It’s wrong that a computer can decide like that,” said Mr Rock. “I hope my case shows how easy it is to get into a difficult financial situation.” He admitted that he had exaggerated his income when applying for cards to get a higher credit limit. Mr Rock said: “I’ve not spent the money on luxuries and I’ve not been on holiday for more than 30 years. It’s been for these operations. I was in terrible pain and private treatment was my only choice.”

The Prudential insurance company says that out of a total number of 11.1 million pensioners in the UK, more than one million pensioners have average debts of £15,500 and as many as 100,000 have debts of between £50,000 and £70,000.

Keith Tondeur, of Credit Action, said the case showed why card companies should share information. He said “The fact that somebody of Mr Rock’s age with nearly no income can get so many cards is a scandal.”

Which is the best expression for each gap – A, B or C?

The dangers of credit cards

When you are growing up, credit cards are part of life. Once you become eighteen, it all starts. You receive 1) in your daily post and there are commercials on TV, too. This starts to interest you. So you think: “I’m responsible enough to get a credit card, I’ll only use it for emergencies.” Then you apply and it may take two or three times to get one. This only makes it 2), of course, because you realize how long you have waited and now you can buy anything you want. After all you don’t have to pay it back for a month. The year is 2007, more and more teens 3) credit cards and are already building their credit history. Credit cards seem to be the easy way to buy things. If you want a pair of jeans but don’t have the cash, you can just pay by credit card. In reality, credit cards are not that easy. Once you have a card, the company gives you a credit limit, which is based on your 4) On average, an eighteen-year-old would have about a $250 limit. This is good because it means teenagers cannot buy products for more than this maximum amount of money. When a credit card’s limit is used 5), it means that you have reached the highest amount of money you can spend and it won’t let you buy any more. A month later – when you receive your bill – the full amount is shown and the minimum amount that you must pay. The minimum amount is a feature on a credit card that allows the buyer to pay only a certain small sum of the money. For example, the bill is $222 and the minimum amount you can pay is $15-$25. If you choose to pay the minimum, the 6) that you have to pay starts now. Each time you do not pay in full, interest rates 7) paid on the debt on your credit card. This is how people with credit cards run into debt. People only pay the 8) each month, but also keep buying things until the card reaches its limit again. This can have terrible effects on your credit history as well. “Your credit history is very important, as it stays with you wherever you go. Your credit history lists the credit cards, how much you owe, and how punctual your payments were.”
